

ARTANGO DANCE SCHOOL

PROBLEM

Redesign the website experience to increase students in the 18-45 year old range.

USER RESEARCH

I researched and asked 4 current dance students aged 55-60 why they chose to learn tango. They were looking to re-ignite passion in their lives. When I asked a group of 5 individuals within the 18-45 year-old range why they wouldn't register for classes at Artango, a common answer was that it appeared to be too passionate and intense.

While taking classes to observe the culture and environment of the studio, I observed that the founders and instructors at the school keep the tone very professional yet humorous.

I then researched typical forms of exercise that individuals aged 18-45 engage in. Many attend classes at gyms, pilates studios, barre studios, and yoga studios, which is likely the demographic that could be interested in taking dance classes at Artango.

HYPOTHESIS

The digital branding of Artango is not aesthetically appealing to a younger audience. Additionally, it implies an unprofessional and overly intense dance school since the visuals feel dated and are not consistent. If we drew from current visual trends in the digital branding of gyms and yoga studios, the digital brand experience would become updated and inline with what consumers are expecting from an exercise studio.

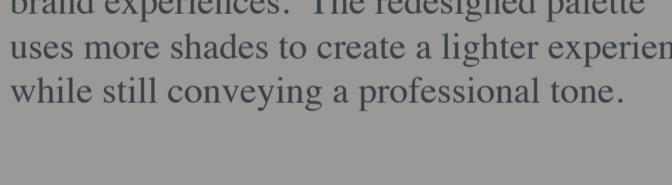

SOLUTION

NAVIGATION

Artango's website required a more intuitive user experience to register for private classes and understanding the group class schedule.

I created a new format and transformed the drop-down menu into a sub navigation bar, enabling the client to always see the array of options they have to engage with Artango's community.

CURRENT DESIGN

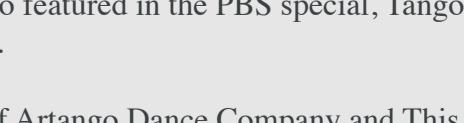

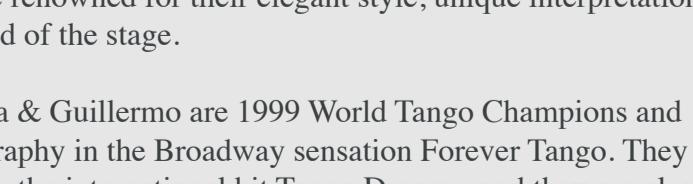

REDESIGN

STYLE CONCEPTS

The original color palette was bright red, black, and white. This palette creates a very intense, deep, and passionate experience with the brand, which in turn, attracts an older audience. My goal was to create a palette with similar colors, but to tone down the intensity and use palettes that a younger audience is currently experiencing with their exercise brand experiences. The redesigned palette uses more shades to create a lighter experience while still conveying a professional tone.
